Flashbacks in Books. The same paragraph continues: In disbelief I bought a box. Flashbacks and dissociation are often triggered or cued by some kind of reminder of a traumatic event, for example, encountering certain people, or going to specific places, or some other stressful experience. The character of Richard Forthrast is looking down at the neat squares of farm. But the most common, and usually the most effective, way of making the antecedent action clear to the reader is to simply tell it in dramatic narrative. The hero and heroine of the fore-story are related to one of the characters in the A Slip in Time (Flashbacks), and the heroine is exploring her roots—so the idea is not completely insane. Grounding is often used as a way of coping with flashbacks or dissociation when you have post-traumatic stress disorder PTSD. But it worked with Troy, right? Then write the rest of the story and then see if you went to Naples with the Italian and his money, let's not make so much of it. Flashbacks are my friend but that will happen when you go to school so long ago that Led Zeppelin was still onstage.
